"Maillol is a sculptor as great as the greats... You see, in this little bronze, there's an example for everyone, old masters and young beginners alike... I'm glad to have seen it... If the word genius, misapplied to so many people today, still has a meaning, it's here... Yes, Maillol has the genius for sculpture... You'd have to be in bad faith, or very ignorant, not to recognize it. And what surety of taste!... What intelligence of life, in the simple!..." - Auguste Rodin[1]

The Ambroise Vollard exhibition in 1902

In 1902, from June 16th to 30th, Ambroise Vollard organized Aristide Maillol's first monographic exhibition in his gallery at 6, rue Laffitte. Thirty-three works were presented, including tapestries, screens, reliefs and statuettes in wood, terracotta, plaster and bronze, as well as decorative art objects.

1902 was a fruitful year for the Catalan sculptor: he took part in group exhibitions as early as January, at the Galerie B. Weill, and in May, at the Galerie Bernheim-Jeune. However, it was the exhibition organized by Vollard that proved a great success and introduced Maillol to art lovers.

Ambroise Vollard and Aristide Maillol signed a first contract on September 10, 1902, validating the sale of some of the sculptor's models "with full ownership and reproduction rights" to his dealer. This contract marked the first time Maillol had sold models. There were nine of them, including Standing Bather, second version.

The Standing Bather, a founding model recognized in artistic circles

The model of the Standing Bather is particularly important in Maillol's work: it is probably at the origin of the collaboration between the sculptor and the dealer, and it inaugurates the bronze edition of Maillol's sculptures by Vollard. The dealer mentions the anecdote in his memoirs: "I said to Maillol, who had just given the final chisel to a wooden statuette: - What if we made a bronze out of it? - A bronze? - Give me the statuette. I'll take care of it. And so, I produced Maillol's first bronze. Afterwards, I was to have a few other models from him of the highest quality."[2]

The theme of the bather was dear to the Catalan sculptor, and we find it on numerous occasions throughout his career. In 1895 for example, it was already present in an oil on canvas titled Mediterranean[3], in which the female figure, standing naked in the center of a seascape, is surrounded by a long white drape blowing in the wind. The motif was later taken up again in sculpture by Maillol at the turn of the century. Reworked, the Standing Bather knows two versions. The two versions are nearly identical, with the exception of a few details: in the first version, the bather's right arm is pressed alongside her body, and a drape covers her forearm; in contrast, the bather in the second version has no drape on her right arm, and it is slightly raised upwards. Another difference is that the bather in the second version wears a high bun atop her hair, which the first version does not have.

Other bathers, close to the Standing bather, appeared at the same time and in different materials (wood, bronze, terracotta). Some have the right arm raised towards the figure's head, the drapery falling all the way down their back, and wrapping around their left ankle[4]; others have a slightly more accentuated contrapposto, the head turned to the left, and the drapery being held, this time, in front of them, with their left hand[5].

The model of the Standing Bather knows a great success: both versions entered the collections of art world personalities of the time. Around 1900, the Romanian-born princess Hélène Bibesco (1855-1902), a great pianist and Maillol's first patron, acquired Standing Bather, first version in wood. The work was also quickly spotted by Auguste Rodin (1840-1917), who acquired an example of Standing Bather, second version, an iron cast for his personal collection at Vollard's gallery on April 2nd, 1904[6]. Following this purchase, Maillol sent a letter of thanks to Rodin, expressing his gratitude: "This is the true reward, the only one that the artist in love with his art hopes for his work, and furthermore, it is an encouragement to me. One walks more briskly in one's path when the great artist at the pinnacle of his glorious career casts a glance at the humble worker who comes behind him."[7] Finally, an example of the Standing Bather, first version is represented on the mantelpiece in Ambroise Vollard's portrait with a cat painted by Pierre Bonnard (1867-1947) around 1924[8].

Provenance & public collections

Eight examples of Standing Bather, second version can be found in public collections worldwide. Most of these were acquired by collectors who were then keen to donate the work to their local museum. In Europe, two examples are kept in France (in Paris, at the Rodin Museum: n°inv. S.00579; and in Troyes, at the Museum of Modern Art: n°inv. MNPL 1675), three in Germany (in Bremen, at the Kunsthalle Bremen: n°inv. Nr.587-1977/4; in Cologne, at the Ludwig Museum: n°inv. Nr ML76/SK 0064; and in Hanover, at the Niedersächsisches Landesmuseum: n°inv. Nr PPl 58), and one in Russia (in Saint-Petersburg, at the State Hermitage Museum: n°inv. H.CK1729). Finally, deux examples are kept in the United States (in Baltimore, at the Museum of Art: n°inv. 1941.120; and in Philadelphia, at the Philadelphia Museum of Art: n°inv. 1963-181-94).

Our example comes from the personal collection of British-born art historian Francis Haskell (1928-2000). Professor at King's College, Cambridge, and later at Oxford University, Haskell published a number of seminal works that have become benchmarks in art history. His work focuses on the social history of art, in other words, the study of the elements surrounding artistic creation, as well as the study of artistic life and milieu, the critical reception of works, and the museum environment. He focused more precisely on the history of patronage and the art market in $17^{\rm th}$ and $18^{\rm th}$ century-Italy (Patrons and Painters, 1963), the history of taste (Rediscoveries in Art, 1976; Taste and the Antique, 1981), and Museums interest in retrospectives of Old Master works (The Ephemeral Museum, 2000). The Standing Bather, second version remained in the historian's family after his death.
